ABSTRACT

This report presents a detailed picture of trends in the segregation of Hispanic children in American urban public schools from 1970 to 1974. A companion volume reports on trends in black school segregation from 1970 to 1974. This volume shows both the broad regional and national trends of segregation of the nation's second largest minority group, and also a detailed year-by-year portrait of developments within many of the biggest school system. The regional reports on Hispanic children are more complete for the northeast and the south than they are for the students in the midwest and west. They are not usable for the border states where there are few students and very poor coverage. The statistics in this book show very wide variation in levels of segregation between school districts. Although there has been little conscious effort to desegregate Hispanic students there is usually relatively little segregation where they are present in small numbers. The statistics also show a very rapid growth in the number of Hispanic urban school systems, and also, an increase in the intensity of their segregation during the period of this report. (Author/AM)

Eugene T. Lowe and William L. Taylor of the Center for National Policy Review are principally responsible for this published report. Gary Orfield, of the University of Illinois, wrote the introduction concerning the history and use of school desegregation statistics. Vickey Shay, Joy Taylor, and Ann Sykes-Dixon of the Center for National Policy Review also contributed valuable clerical help in the preparation of this report.

The data presented here, though, was collected by the Office of Civil Rights of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Because of financial constraints, however, HEW was unable to fully edit and publish a report. The Center for National Policy Review obtained the raw data that had been collected and proposed to the National Institute of Education that it be published.

TRENDS IN HISPANIC SEGREGATION, 1970-74

Introduction

Gary Orfield
University of Illinois, Urbana

This thin volume offers the most detailed picture of trends in the segregation of Hispanic children in American urban public schools that has ever been published.* It shows both the broad regional and national trends of segregation of the nation's second largest minority group and also detailed year-by-year portraits of developments within scores of the biggest school systems. The statistics show both a very rapid growth of Latino children in urban systems and also an increase in the intensity of their segregation in this five year period. Since these tables contain the most recent information assembled by HEW, they are the best available starting point for diagnosing what is happening and beginning to think through the policy implications.*

Before considering the major issues, the reader should be warned that the best available information leaves much to be desired. The last complete national estimates of enrollment prepared by HEW were based on 1972 survey data. In order to discern patterns of change throughout the early 1970s, the

* A companion volume reports on trends in black-school segregation, 1970-74.

 Minorities include five separate racial/ethnic categories: American Indian, Black, Asian American, Spanish (Hispanic) Surnamed American, and others.

 These statistics were collected for 1974 and since then may have been altered by court-ordered desegregation plans. Such plans have occurred in the following cities: Dallas, Baltimore, Milwaukee, Omaha, and Boston.

* Statistics are now being collected by OCR-HEW on other kinds of problems such as pushouts, disciplinary action, classroom segregation, etc.

data presented here had to be limited to school systems which consistently reported their enrollment statistics to HEW each year from 1970 to 1974. This means that smaller districts, particularly those outside the South, and districts with relatively few minority students are often excluded. Including these districts might have the impact of lowering the level of segregation modestly. In using tables reporting regional and national statistics, the reader should note the information at the top of the table reporting "estimated percent coverage of Latino students." This information shows that the regional reports on Latino children are more complete in the Northeast and the South, that they cover approximately two-thirds of the students in the Midwest and West, and are not usable in the Border states, where there are few students and very poor coverage.

When working with the statistics of individual school districts, it is important to note the warning in each table that the data presented for the 1974-75 school year is not necessarily complete or fully edited. New York City is one of a few districts which failed to provide data for a number of schools. In those cases where the 1974 data shows coverage of a substantially smaller number of schools and students than were reported in 1973, the 1973 data should be used.

This data is published in its incomplete form because HEW's Office for Civil Rights does not intend to complete work on the data and says it lacks funds for publishing a full national directory. The Center for National Policy Review received a grant from the National Institute of Education to publish this statistical report of the HEW collected data. OCR collected no data during the 1975-76 school year and much time will elapse before the publication of any information collected during the current school year.

Segregation of Latino students has not been a major national policy issue, but it is certain to become more important in the future for several reasons. First, Latino students constitute a large and rapidly growing minority group, already the most important minority group in a number of major school districts. Second, these children are now more concentrated in predominantly minority schools than black children. Third, the Supreme Court's 1973 Keyes decision established a constitutional right of desegregated education for Latinos (at least those in the Southwest states) paralleling the right accorded to black pupils earlier. Fourth, a large number of Latino children will, in any case, be affected by desegregation plans developed in response to lawsuits filed by civil rights organizations.

The statistics in this book show very wide variation in levels of segregation between school districts. Although there has been little conscious effort to desegregate Hispanic students, there is usually relatively little segregation where they are present in small numbers. In major systems with large Latino enrollments, the segregation is often far higher, and steadily spreading. Intensely segregated schools with 90 percent or more minority enrollment held 46 percent of Los Angeles Latino pupils by 1974. Between 1970 and 1974 the numbers of Hispanic children attending such schools grew from 14 percent to 31 percent in Chicago and from 21 percent to 40 percent in Houston. These figures contrasted sharply with the low level of segregation in San Diego and the highly integrated pattern in Sacramento, which had voluntarily desegregated almost a decade earlier.

Puerto Rican students have been particularly affected by immigration patterns which have taken them into the heart of severely segregated, rapidly declining central cities. Their extraordinary concentration in New York City means that there are serious obstacles to successful desegregation. The 1973 New York figures show that almost two-thirds of the city's Spanish-surname pupils attended intensely segregated schools. The secondary centers of Puerto Rican settlement in Chicago and several aging East Coast cities also had high concentrations of minority children and severe segregation.

At a time when the general trends affecting urban school enrollment all point down and black migration from the South into Northern and Western cities has ceased to be a significant influence on school enrollments, the growth and the concentration of the Latino population will command increasing attention. The geographic focus of settlement so far means that the issue is negligible in some major cities. In 1974, for example, Pittsburgh, reported 111 Hispanic pupils, Atlanta, 165, and Baltimore 387. At the opposite extreme there are a number of significant Texas systems with Mexican American majorities, where Anglo children represent the minority cultural and linguistic tradition. In some of the nation's largest cities, Latino enrollment has become important so fast that the change has been largely unnoticed and little positive policy for helping the school system has been devised.

Within the past three years the courts have confronted overburdened school systems with dual demands for change. After the 1973 Keyes decision raised the issue of segregation, the 1974 Lau decision sustained HEW's regulations requiring special educational programs for non-English speaking children. These two decisions and supporting litigation and enforcement activities by private and public agencies have spotlighted issues of vital importance to the future of the nation's second largest minority. Perhaps the statistics presented here may help to spread awareness of what is happening and to accelerate the search for answers.

Questions about the collections of this data should be directed to the HEW Office for Civil Rights. Technical questions should be addressed to DBS Corporation, 1515 Wilson Blvd., Arlington, Va. 22209. Other questions may be directed to the Center for National Policy Review.
